Five Golden Rules for Regenerating Food Like a Pro!

Regenerating food to perfection is an art that requires precision and expertise. Follow these five golden rules to ensure your frozen meals are brought back to life with finesse:

1. Optimal Temperature Control

Avoid sudden rises of high temperatures during the regeneration process. Respect the cold chain to maintain the organoleptic properties of the food. Keep temperatures below 70°C to prevent overcooking and preserve the original taste and texture.

2. Temperature Monitoring

Use a heat probe to measure the temperature inside the dish. Ensure that the heart of the food reaches a serving temperature of 65°C to 70°C for at least 10 minutes to guarantee it is fully cooked and ready for consumption.

3. Humidity Balance

Maintain the juiciness of dishes by incorporating the right level of humidity during regeneration. Adding an optimal percentage of steam enhances the freshness of the food and prevents water loss.

4. Time and Temperature Management

Constantly monitor the temperature-time relationship for effective regeneration. Ensure that the regeneration process does not exceed two hours to preserve the quality and flavor of the dish.

5. Strategic Regeneration Planning

Plan the regeneration process to avoid serving cold or burnt dishes. Program the regeneration with ample time for the food to rest without cooling. Be mindful not to exceed the maximum regeneration time to retain the dish's aroma and flavor.
